

Group plan

Relevancy, needs, frictions & concerns

FT User Research

Jan '26

Background & Goals

- Previous research (Pre-editing stages, FT social sharing) shows Facetune users often seek feedback from friends and family during editing, suggesting social influence in the process.
- The goal is to inform if a group plan fits users' current behaviors and need, and explore potential risks and barriers.

Research questions

- 1) How do users currently share (or not) about editing in Facetune with friends or family?
- 2) What value (if any) do users see in sharing a Facetune subscription plan?
- 3) What needs, frictions, or concerns do users have around shared subscription?

What was done?

Method:

A quantitative survey with multiple-choice questions, followed by open-ended questions.

200

FT users

Aged 18-50

Women

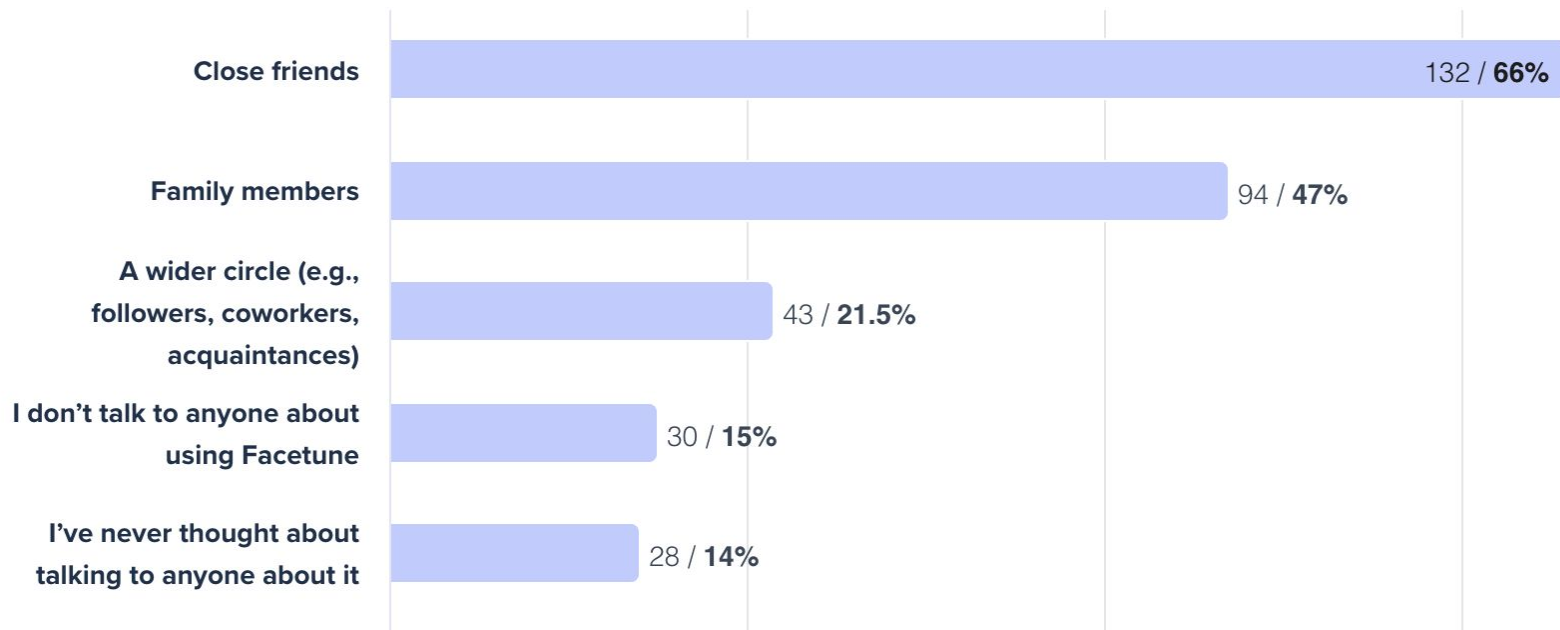

52%

Subscribers

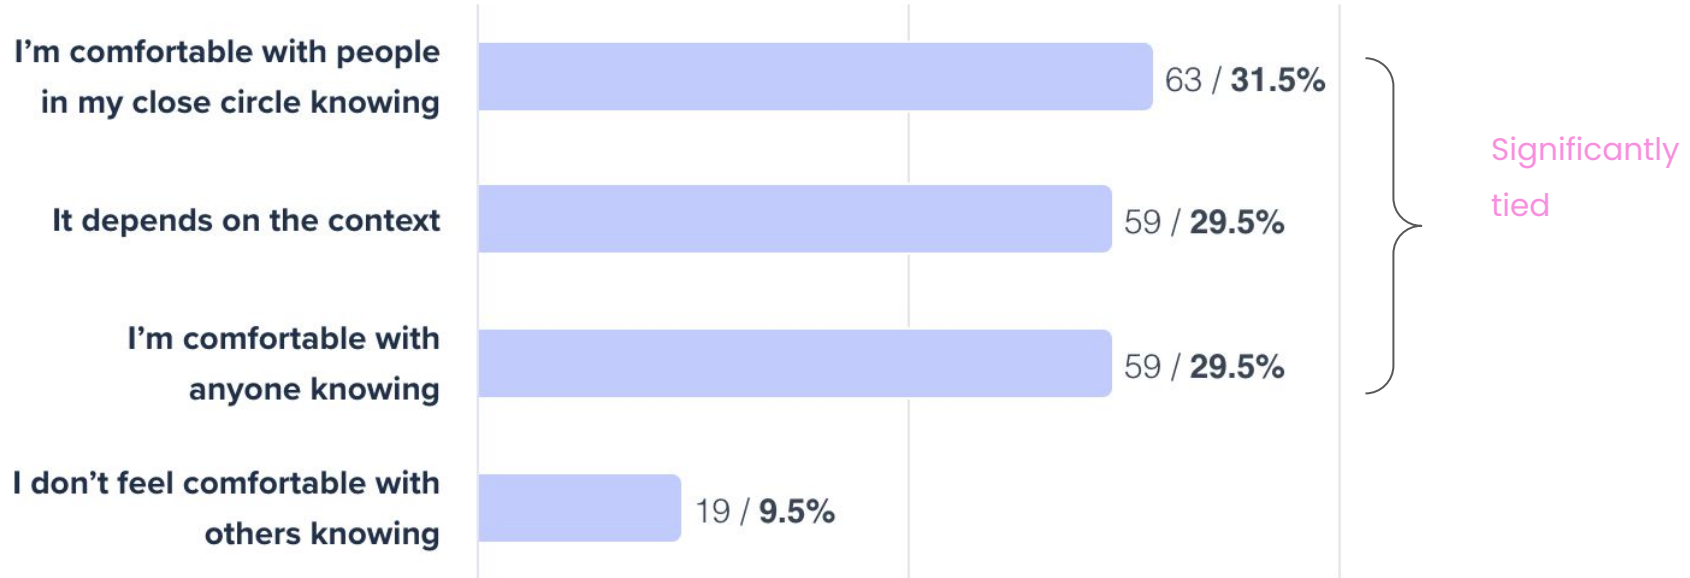

48%

Non-subscribers

Facetune conversations happen primarily within close, trusted circles – 66% share with close friends, 47% with family

It seems like the vast majority of users express some form of comfort sharing their Facetune use; However ->

However, the qualitative data reveals a more private, hesitant approach: when users say “it depends on the context,” it usually means they won’t lie if asked – not that they’re willing to share.

A passive, reactive sharing mindset: Users take a “don’t ask, don’t tell” approach – honest when asked, silent otherwise.

Users don't “advertise” using FT, but are honest when editing is discussed or they're asked directly

“I don't publicize that I use facetune, but I don't hide it if people ask”

“I would talk about it if someone asked me what I used to edit photos. Otherwise, I wouldn't bring it up in conversation”

Sharing is limited to minor edits – users fear being seen as inauthentic or catfishing

Users distinguish between "acceptable" minor edits (lighting, background) and major alterations (body reshaping, face changes) that they're less willing to disclose

"I feel comfortable sharing more common / acceptable features on facetune. For example, i always use the red eye removal feature. However, if I edit a certain body part out of insecurity, i would feel less comfortable sharing"

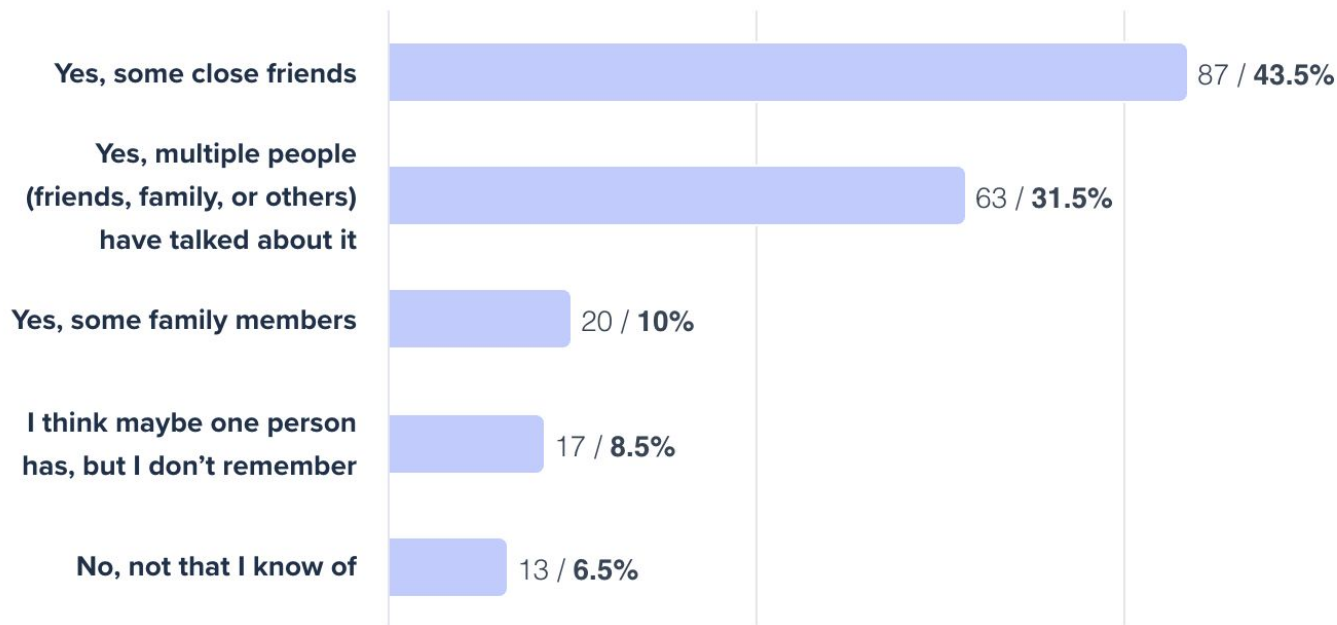

Selective sharing with trusted circles

Users feel safest with close friends and especially with fellow Facetune users who won't judge.

"I would only feel comfortable if they also use Facetune"

"I feel fine telling my closest friends and close family but not to judgemental family members or acquaintances"

Talking about editing stays within close friendships:
44% know a few close friends who share using Facetune, compared to 32% who see sharing across their wider social network

Even though most users report having individual subscriptions (65%), 35% already use group plans for some or most apps

Which group plans are most commonly used?

Netflix

Apple services

Including Apple Music, iCloud, Apple TV+, etc.

Hulu

Spotify

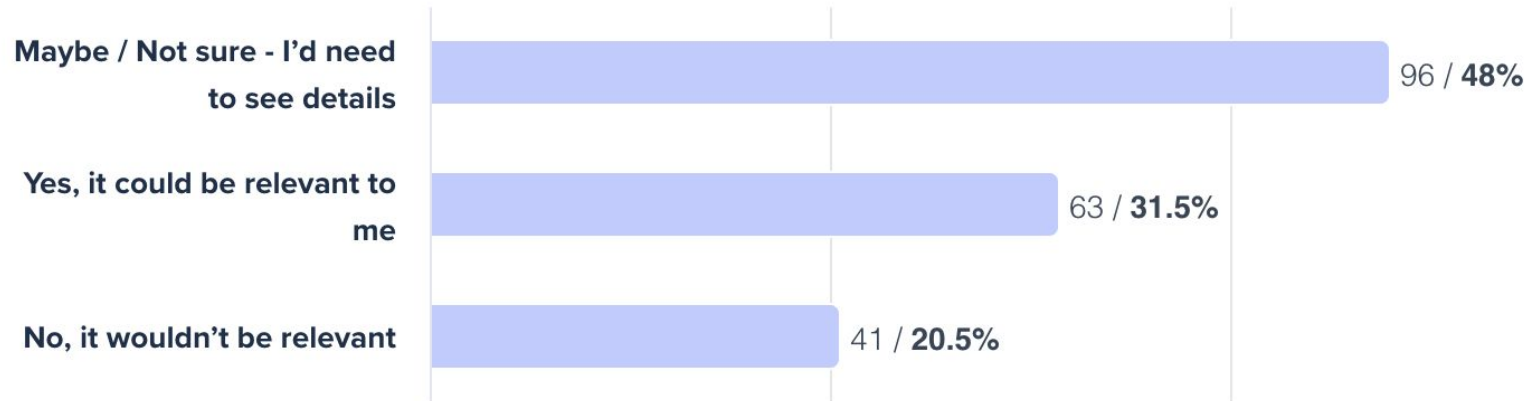

Disney+

Youtube

35% already use group plans for some or most apps, suggesting familiarity with the model

The key question is whether Facetune fits users' mental model of a shared subscription – especially given selective editing-related sharing

When asked, nearly half of users say they are uncertain or need more details before considering a paid FT group or family subscription

What concerns or reasons make users feel that a group or family subscription for FT wouldn't be relevant to them?

No, it wouldn't be relevant

41 / 20.5%

Users want to keep their Facetune usage private

"The privacy concern I wouldn't feel comfortable especially with social media photos"

They don't know enough people that would be interested or they're the only ones using it

"I just dont think I know enough people who would want to do a group subscription"

"It's like the elephant in the room right we all use editing but we don't talk about it. Also for me no one else in my family uses it because they don't post and my friends who talk to me about it just send me pictures to edit for them"

People know others edit, but don't know who would actually pay for it

No, it wouldn't be relevant

41 / 20.5%

"I feel like I might use it more than other people (especially family). Like, it wouldn't be worthwhile for them to pay toward it"

"I don't know anyone else in my inner circle that would be willing to use a premium version of Facetune, hence why I wouldn't consider a family subscription"

"I just don't see photo editing to be something that I need or want to have a family subscription for. I don't think my family would be willing to split the cost or have a strong need to pay for a subscription. I think it would be too much of a hassle to split a subscription with my friends..."

Users see a FT group plan as relevant mainly because of cost savings

"I don't think I would ever pay for the subscription alone (sorry), but I think I may be more inclined if I were to share it with someone else/multiple people as it feels more worth it"

"If it was cheaper than the typical subscription price, which is way too expensive currently, I would consider it with friends if they were also using it"

"I think a group or family subscription for facetune could be useful because it will help the subscription likely be cheaper since its multiple people"

Who users see as relevant to share a group plan with?

Users most commonly mention friends and family (e.g., siblings).
Beyond that, two additional mentions stood out:

- Children (young adults) – “I would share it with my daughters they are young adult”
- Other creators – “The people id probably want to include is close friends or the creatives i work with”

The main barrier isn't the group plan itself – it's network awareness: knowing and identifying potential co-users

Users see group plans as relevant when they know others use Facetune; when usage is unclear or hidden (stigma / privacy), relevancy drops.

Top 4 things users want to know before joining

1

Pricing and cost details

Need transparent information about total cost and how payment works

"I'd want to know the actual cost of everything! And how it will be split"

Photo privacy

There is a deep concern about photo privacy – users want assurance their edited photos won't be visible to other group members

"I would want to ensure privacy, that we can't accidentally see each others photos"

Top 4 things users need to know before joining:

3 Subscription management & control

Want clarity on who manages the subscription and what control each member has

“who can change what settings and stuff like that”

“who has the ability to kick people off the plan”

4 Benefits and features

Need to understand what features come with group / family plan and how it compares to individual subscriptions

“I would like to know the capabilities that we will have and also which advantages it would give us”

Subscribers may show higher adoption potential for a group plan than non-subscribers. Why?

Non-subscribers are 2X more hesitant to talk about their editing in Facetune

I don't talk to anyone about
using Facetune

10 / 9.6%

Subscribers

I don't talk to anyone about
using Facetune

20 / 20.8%

Non-subscribers

Non-subscribers are 2X more hesitant to share FT use

Subscribers significantly see more relevancy in a group plan than non-subscribers

Subscribers

Non-subscribers

Subscribers are 1.7× more likely to see clear value in a group plan

Recommendations

- Consider introducing group plan with existing subscribers first – they're already paying and are more open to share others they use Facetune.
- We need to make sure the pricing offer clear, meaningful savings – as cost is the primary driver for adoption.
- Privacy is non-negotiable – users want to save money but will not compromise on privacy. Both concerns must be clearly addressed.

Key takeaways to communicate with users

- There will be no access to each other's photos – this should be explicit and prominent.
- Clear subscription control & ownership –
who can manage the plan, change settings, or cancel must be transparent and simple.

Open question: Discovery & Adoption

- Users are most likely to consider a group plan if they already have an identifiable social network using Facetune.
- We should explore a discovery or collaboration mechanism that surfaces potential co-users.
- One direction to consider: photo consultation or shared feedback features that create natural interaction and serve as an entry point to a shared subscription. Based on previous research.
- We should think of an added, social value that goes beyond price and nudges users toward forming a group plan.
